Assumptions of modern science

- There are natural causes for things that happen in the world around us.
- Evidence from the natural world can be used to learn about those causes.
- There is consistency in the causes that operate in the natural world.

- “We are seriously considering that there’s another part of the universe that we can’t be in contact with, that we can’t measure—that obeys different laws including the fundamental laws of physics. And that’s quite sad when you think about it because it means we may end up with an explanation like ‘Things are like they are because they’re like that.’”
